When you debug the angular application, it uses node server to serve the requests. Usually, the command is ng serve or ng s which basically compiles the application and launches the node server to serve the application at localhost on port 4200 by default.

When you build the angular application, usually by the command ng build —prod, it generates Html and JavaScripts and CSS files along with all the assets and saved in the build folder in the root of the source by default.

You can then copy the content of that build folder in any web server and it will work.

Angular uses webpack. And webpack is complete package for web application with multiple features. For Eg. Providing server to host files, Build configuration, Tree shake method, Code minification, packaging etc.
